E-commerce Connectivity in ASEAN

Chen, Lurong; Kimura, Fukunari | April 2020

Electronic commerce (e-commerce) has been radically altering our society. Economic activities using tools of the Internet or new information and communications technology (ICT) to purchase goods or services or conduct business online are rapidly expanding. Global cross-border e-commerce has become increasingly important in the international economy. Various factors have laid a solid foundation for the booming cross-border e-commerce, such as high-speed Internet, the use of smartphones, the facilitation of online payments, the changes in consumer behaviour, services sector liberalisation, and so on. Global retail e-commerce sales have been growing faster than traditional retail sales since 2014. Asia is benefiting more than any other region in the world when cross-border e-commerce has introduced new dynamics to international trade (Chen, 2017). The next Asian miracle of growth could be born with the region's digital transformation to the new era, whose new ideas, new technologies, new mindset, new tools, and new businesses are changing the way of people's living, work, and study. E-commerce is disruptive to the traditional wholesaling and retailing not only by bringing business from offline to online but, more importantly, by introducing new digital tools, such as artificial intelligence, cloud computing, big data, and machine learning, into the business. To the end users, the most obvious distinction between e-commerce and the traditional business mode is that e-commerce activities involve fewer intermediate links between sellers and buyers. It has higher requirements on services, especially those on information, payments, and logistics. The digital platform can also pool all the related services for market matching.
